INTRODUCTION

Pakistan's energy security remains highly dependent on imported crude oil and refined petroleum products (including diesel, petrol, and furnace oil), exposing the country to supply disruptions and price volatility. With no fully developed Strategic Petroleum Reserve (SPR) system, Pakistan has limited buffer capacity to manage shocks arising from geopolitical tensions.

Recent supply constraints and volatility in both crude and refined product markets have further highlighted the need for resilient storage and contingency infrastructure to sustain refinery operations and ensure uninterrupted fuel availability.

In response, the Government of Pakistan has initiated plans to develop countrywide strategic storage facilities, initially for crude oil only. In this regard Pakistan LNG Limited ("PLL") has been assigned the task to lead the process by the Government of Pakistan.

The project will focus on assessing technical feasibility, storage infrastructure requirements, and optimal reserve levels for crude. It will also evaluate existing infrastructure, define phased investment and financing strategies, and align with global best practices to enhance long-term supply security and crisis preparedness.

OBJECTIVES

This study will be aimed at answering the following key questions:

1. To evaluate Pakistan's net trade (import/export) position in crude oil and refined petroleum products (including gasoline, jet, diesel, fuel oil), over the short, medium and long-term?
2. Pakistan's domestic consumption of crude oil and refined products, over the short, medium and long term?
3. How many days of strategic stockholding for crude oil would be sufficient to provide confidence in the adequacy of its strategic reserves (e.g. 15, 30, 60 or 90 days)?
4. To evaluate the most suitable metric for Pakistan's strategic stockholding framework – namely days of net imports xx days of domestic consumption, taking into account the higher of the two would ordinarily govern, as informed by the analysis of the net trade and consumption?
5. To assess the extent of existing in-country storage capacity in that could potentially be used, e.g., unused FO storages (IPP and GPP terminated contracts), that may be repurposed for strategic stockholding, subject to health assessment and technical suitability?
6. To evaluate the most suitable form of storage for strategic stockholding, including underground and aboveground options, based on the findings of the assessment referred to in point 2 above?
7. To identify, the most suitable locations in Pakistan for the development and augmentation of strategic petroleum storage capacities?

Once this has been determined, the operating model can be evaluated, introducing further questions to address:

1. To evaluate appropriate funding mechanism for the modifications of existing storage facilities and the development of greenfield storages for strategic stockholding?
2. To assess whether Pakistan should incentivize third parties including friendly oil-exporting countries, to develop storage facilities, and hold crude oil within Pakistan for strategic stock holding?
3. This should include evaluation of the legal and commercial framework required to ensure Pakistan's enforceable right to draw specified volumes upon the occurrence of a release-triggering event, the appropriate cost-sharing mechanism (including joint capital investment, tolling, or similar arrangements), and a review of global models with recommendations for implementation in Pakistan.
4. To evaluate the appropriate governance framework for Pakistan's strategic reserve, including the possible establishment of a dedicated authority responsible for maintaining strategic reserve volumes.

The Scope of Work is available at Annexure-I.
